Water Risk Management Workshop

June 11, 2013

Since 2010, the Securities and Exchange Commission has required companies to disclose financially material risks from climate change to their investors, including water availability and quality.

As water risk becomes increasingly material to various types of businesses, corporate managers are developing new business processes to manage this risk. These processes range from defining water management roles and responsibilities within corporate hierarchies to developing complex models to predict future water availability.

In parallel, a number of water management tools and techniques have been developed for managers to include in their processes, such as regional water data sources, methods of calculating water risk, and sustainability reporting guidelines.

This workshop is designed for senior executives from leading companies to:

- Discuss water as a strategic business issue
- Review water risk identification tools
- Share current best practices in water risk management
- Offer case examples and presentations
- Discuss the challenges of managing future corporate water risks

Case studies to be presented include:

Todd Swingle, Manager, Corporate Environmental Management, Cummins

Glenn Austin, Director, Corporate Responsibility, Monsanto, “Water: A Material Issue Best Managed with our Customers”

Ed Pinero, Chief Sustainability Officer, Veolia Water North America

John Echeverria, Professor of Law, Acting Director of Environmental Law Center, Vermont Law School
